English Law for Business Students

Many of today's students in further and higher education do not have a traditional approach to learning. The reasons for this include current teaching styles in schools, a crowded curriculum and an even more crowded life, both on campus and off. For many, the need to earn a living eats into basic learning time and, for those following multidisciplinary programmes, there is the difficulty of balancing the competing demands of a variety of subjects. Add to this the cost of traditional textbooks and the inadequacy of library funding and it is obvious that a different approach to teaching and learning is called for. The approach adopted here is a response to this situation. With the exception of Chapter One (The Sources of Law) there is minimal explanation of the substantive law and the facts of the three hundred cases are given without verdicts. The purpose of this is to generate discussion during seminars or, in the case of readers working alone, thoughtful analysis. Once a conclusion has been reached it can be checked in Chapter Eight (Verdicts). Chapter Nine consists of seminar topics and assignments and Chapter Ten contains suggested outline answers.

However, there is an exception to this principle of pacta sunt servanda if non-performance is caused by upheavals beyond the parties' control. Afterwards I will have a more detailed look on the concept of frustration in English law and continue by briefly outlining the corresponding principles in other legal systems. In order to illustrate the rather abstract concept I will contrast two cases in detail and point to a few other ones in more general terms.
